

Apply for Federal Student Aid Following these Easy Steps

Fill out a FAFSA and submit it early

The first step in the process is to fill out the Free Application for Federal Student Aid (FAFSA). You can print out a FAFSA or submit it electronically through www.fafsa.ed.gov.

Fill the FAFSA out completely since an incomplete application may be returned creating an unnecessary delay. Make sure to answer “yes” to the item on the FAFSA about your interest in a student loan, so your eligibility for one will be determined.

You stand a better chance of getting the best aid package possible for your situation if you complete the application process early. We recommend submitting your application no later than March 31. You should also check with the school you wish to attend, as they often set their own application deadlines.

The federal government determines your eligibility

The information you supply on the FAFSA allows the federal government to determine your eligibility for various financial aid programs including:

- Federal grants, which do not need to be repaid.
- Federal work-student, which allows a student to work part-time on campus.
- Federal loan programs, Stafford subsidized and Stafford unsubsidized, which are offered through your credit union.

Receive your SAR Report

If you submit a paper FAFSA form, within four to six weeks a Student Aid Report (SAR), summarizes the financial aid program for which you qualify, will be sent to you and the school(s) to which you applied. If you applied via the Web, you will receive a SAR by mail usually within a week after a complete application is received. Based on the SAR, your school will determine the maximum amount of aid for which you qualify under each program and send you an “award” letter.

Receive your award letter

The award letter breaks down the total amount of grants, scholarships and federal aid for which you are eligible in an academic year.
